

yes there a lot of people who do not seem understand what the AFC stands for or what they do for united states. They seem to think that, because they have used or been reported to children and family services, they have the right to advocate or tell others that this is what they need to do. When really the receipeints have certain repositibilities to up hold, when it come to the recovery process to work. They also have minimal knowllege of how much it cost to the agency and the client to correct the issue.

Especially in the state of Minnesota, where there is a lot of risk, certain types of abuse, and some of us choose not to get involud period. Please excuse the spelling mistakes.
